EMERGENCY DNI THREAT ASSESSMENT
NOVEMBER 18, 2026

Clayton Breitenstein
Director of National Intelligence

OVERVIEW:

A coordinated attack targeting the Eiffel Tower in Paris and Istanbul, Turkey, is now a critical national security emergency. An alliance between Iran, Russia, Venezuela, and Hezbollah, known as the Iron Crescent, has claimed responsibility for the attack. The political or military outcomes the perpetrators sought to achieve remain unclear. The Russian delegation contributed a concise, two-word policy directive stating "fuck France." While the council largely concurred, it did not fully clarify the broader strategic motivations.

Our immediate concerns include the possibility of further attacks against U.S. allies, potential NATO escalation, financial market disruptions, and adversarial actors exploiting the crisis to advance their own strategic interests.

INTELLIGENCE PRIORITIES

1. ADDITIONAL ATTACKS: The intelligence community is expanding intelligence capabilities and coordinating intelligence sharing with European partners to assess the possibility of further attacks.
2. STRATEGIC OBJECTIVES: Motives beyond "fuck France" have yet to be established. We are assessing whether the attacks were meant to destabilize France and Turkey, undermine NATO cohesion, or achieve broader geopolitical objectives.
3. DEGREE OF COORDINATION: The intelligence community is assessing the degree of coordination between members of the Iron Crescent. We are prioritizing SIGINT collection to assess communications, command structures, and the extent of coordination between Iran, Hezbollah, Russia, and Venezuela.

4. DOMESTIC SECURITY: We are determining if the Iron Crescent poses any credible threats against American territory, facilities, diplomats, or citizens abroad.

RECOMMENDED ACTIONS

I recommend immediate interagency coordination with French and Turkish intelligence, alongside expanded intelligence-sharing with NATO partners. We must determine if these attacks represent an isolated operation or serve as an opening phase for a broader campaign against American allies.

Additionally, I recommend developing a comprehensive assessment of the Iron Crescent's organizational structure, capabilities, and strategic objectives. The intelligence community must establish the degree of state involvement and identify potential follow-up threats before the administration determines its response.

Given the severity of the attacks, I recommend preparing diplomatic, economic, and military response options for presidential consideration. The United States must demonstrate its commitment to allied security while ensuring that any response is informed by reliable intelligence and avoids unnecessary escalation.