Situation

Allied nations across Europe are currently experiencing a significant volume of bomb threats targeting schools, airports and planes, seaports, media centers, and strategic infrastructure. Threats are often multinational, targeting institutions and infrastructure that requires the intervention and coordination of multiple state counterterror forces. A large volume of fake threats could obscure and limit efficacy to respond to genuine security threats.

Recommended Action

As response times and effectiveness of response is primarily predicated on coordination, the U.S. should leverage INTERPOL and ad hoc multinational threat response provisions to increase response effectiveness. In targeting these threats, ECHELON systems and intelligence cooperation with regional allies is critical to mission success. It is recommended that diplomatic paths be taken to increase operational parity through this crisis.
