Station Chief Olivia Muzylowski

CIA Intelligence Officer

Eurasia

I am the station chief for Euroasia, which means I am the senior intelligence officer managing all intelligence and operations within the perimeter of Euroasia. In short, I help gather and oversee all the relatively important information coming out of my region and decide what is important enough to report back to my own government. As an intelligence officer, my goal is to view the world through a nonpartisan lens and let evidence and facts lead my decision making rather than my personal ideologies. My ideal world is one absent of conflict, where global information is abundant, trustworthy and transparent. A world where we are all connected and honest, where states communication and intentions are clear. However, I am aware of institutional tensions and the necessity to be able to knock down internal bureaucratic roadblocks.

As a station chief for Eurasia, my area of interest encompasses everything from Eastern Europe, all the way down to the Pacific, including China. I am in charge of collecting intelligence, reporting intelligence, managing personnel, and overseeing all intelligence gathering operations. I am expected to only be reporting useful information and those bureaucratically above me are supposed to use said information to make informed decisions and protect our country and its allies. Intelligence officers run into setbacks, mostly bureaucratic, including but not limited to ego, groupthink and hierarchical structures.

1. Bringing and end to the Ukraine-Russian War
2. Rising possibility of war between Russia and NATO
3. Halting the political alignment of Russia, China and Iran
4. Combating the resurgence of terrorist organization since the US withdrawal from Afghanistan
5. Western partnership gaps with Euroasia
6. The weaponization of AI and governments within Eurasia using it against civilians
